Webanywhere and Google seminar named in top five at Learning Technologies 2013

Webanywhere, a global workplace learning provider, together with Brad Kilshaw, Enterprise Channel Manager of Google Enterprise were regarded as having one of the top five seminars in the Learning Technologies' 2013 visitor exit poll.

The exit poll, conducted by Now Communication, consisted of data gleaned from the visitors of Learning Technologies, just moments after leaving the show. The information obtained from the survey provides invaluable data for all 230 organisations who exhibited there, allowing them to understand the thoughts, views and experiences of the visitors. When asked:

“When you studied the free seminar series, which presentations held most appeal for you?”

‘Stretch your organisation further with Google Apps for Enterprise’ by Webanywhere and Google came 4th. This seminar provided an overview of Google Apps for Enterprise, looking at how it enables your organisation to maximise the benefits of cloud technologies, improving collaboration, information sharing and efficiency.

It examined how to deliver single sign-on Google integration with Totara LMS, Moodle and other enterprise data sources, and how this can reduce IT hardware/software spend on servers, whilst improving communication within an organisation.

“It was fantastic to see that our seminar, ‘Stretch your organisation further with Google Apps for Enterprise’, was one of the most appealing, especially as this was only our second year exhibiting at the Learning Technologies show” says Conor Gilligan, Head of Operations for Workplace Learning at Webanywhere. “We are keen to demonstrate how, with the right e-learning tools, businesses can utilise the skills and talents of their workforce.”

With over 5,000 visitors attending this years event, it is considered to be the largest learning technologies event in Europe. Details about Learning Technologies 2014 are available online.
